sean - just a quick word of advice - and for the moment, lets just forget the fact that you hired one of the foremost and best criminal defense attorneys in the free world, a man for whom i, a guy whos been practicing 12 long and hard years, have the utmost respect. when your lawyer urges you to pursue a course of conduct to solidify your defense, you do it. to act in contravention of such advise is tantamount to committing litigation suicide. having said that, if you choose not to hire dr. mutter, and/or should you continue to persist in your layman's, and ill-advised, choreography of your own defense, then you are likely to both have good cause to be very upset with yourself at the conclusion of your case (which, by the way, is imminently closing in upon you) as well as plenty of time to brood over your fateful decision-making. i cannot emphasize strongly enough my absolute and unbridled support and concurrence with all of milton's strategic suggestions. while, it is possible that you are a better judge of criminal defense technique than either or both milton and/or i, it is also highly improbable. still, the choice remains yours to make. good luck. ==> mah/esq
